               THE COURTROOM DEPUTY: All rise.
 5
               THE COURT: Good morning.
 6
               Okay.
                     You can have a seat.
                                            Thank you.
 7
               All right. Let me get to know counsel.
 8 welcome to remove your mask when you're speaking and while 9
    you're seated at counsel table.
10
               All right. Let me get to know the parties. So we're 11 here in the case Koons versus Reynolds, et al. The docket 12 number is 22-7464. Let me start with appearances. I'll start 13 with the plaintiff.
14
               MR. JENSEN: Good morning, Your Honor. David Jensen 15 for the plaintiffs.
16
               THE COURT: Good morning. And welcome.
17
              MS. CAI: Good morning, Your Honor. Angela Cai for 18
    the Attorney General, the Superintendent of State Police, and 19
    the acting Sussex County prosecutor.
20
               THE COURT: Okay. So you're entering an appearance 21 for Sussex County, okay. All right. Welcome.
22
               MS. REILLY: Assistant Attorney General Jean Reilly for the same defendants as Ms. Cai.
23
24
               THE COURT: Okay.
                                 Welcome.
25
               MR. GOLDBERG: Good morning, Your Honor. First

1
     Assistant County Counsel, Howard Goldberg, on behalf of 2
     Prosecutor Grace Macaulay for Camden County.
 3
               THE COURT: Okay. Welcome.
 4
               MS. RUFFIN: Good morning, Your Honor. Attorney 5 Murianda Ruffin, just substituting in today for Attorney James 6 Ferguson. We are county counsel for Atlantic County, for the 7
     Atlantic County prosecutor.
 8
               THE COURT:
                          Okay. All right. Welcome.
                                                        Good to see 9
     you all.
10
               All right. I set this down for a hearing. This is 11 before me on the plaintiffs' application for temporary restraints. Mr. Jensen, I'll hear from you.
12
13
               I thought the way that I would lay out the oral 14 argument, counsel, is to lay it out by various topics.
15 wanted to first address the issue of standing. I then want to 16 turn to the issue of irreparable injury. I then want to turn 17 to the likelihood of success on the merits and then public 18 interest.
19
               So it seems to me, it would make more sense if I 20 could first have you, Mr. Jensen, address the issue and then 21 turn to the defendants to respond, and I'll have various 22 questions, okay?
23
               MR. JENSEN: Sure.
                                   That sounds great.
24
               THE COURT:
                           Is that okay?
25
               MR. JENSEN: Yes.

1 THE COURT: Okay. So let me start with the issue of 2 standing. 3 I have before me, Mr. Jensen -- well, do you want to 4 make a preliminary statement? I didn't want to interrupt your 5 presentation if you wanted to make a preliminary statement. 6 MR. JENSEN: Sure. I might as well. 7 THE COURT: Okay. 8 MR. JENSEN: Use the lecturn, I assume. 9 THE COURT: Yes, please. 10 And I'm just a little hard of hearing, Mr. Jensen, so 11 if you can just keep your voice up, please. MR. JENSEN: You bet. 12 13 THE COURT: Okay. Thank you. 14 MR. JENSEN: Good morning, Your Honor. I'm here 15 today on behalf of the plaintiffs, which is three individuals 16 and four organizations, but I'm really here on behalf of 17 hundreds of thousands of lawful gun owners in New Jersey. 18 Most of the people living in the United States have 19 been able to exercise their right to bear arms well before the 20 Supreme Court decided Bruen. For many years, people in states 21 like Connecticut and Delaware and Pennsylvania have been able 22 to obtain permits to carry handguns; and once they've done so, 23 they've been able to carry handguns with them as they went 24 about their daily business, so driving their vehicles, stopping for gas, going to restaurants, shopping at the grocery store.

There have always been some limited areas where people have not been able to take guns. Until two weeks ago, the only place the statutes of New Jersey placed off limits were schools.

Obviously acting in the role of proprietor, the State had placed correctional institutions, police departments, courthouses, places like that off limits as a general proposition. But you'll notice a common theme running through these places, which is that these are places that often restrict access. They often require people to pass through security screenings, and they often have their own armed security present.

There are also places --

THE COURT: And the plaintiffs aren't challenging those provisions in the newly enacted legislation. They're not challenging schools, they're not challenging day care centers, et cetera, correct?

MR. JENSEN: That is correct. And certainly some of these areas, based on what the Supreme Court has already said in both Heller as well as in Bruen, would appear to pass muster.

We specifically singled out particular areas where our assessment was that if there is indeed a right to bear arms in public for the purpose of self-defense, it does not appear that these can be defended. And further, it really doesn't require any further examination of the record or development of the record.

Since the Court asked to proceed under the issue of standing, I'll do that, but that was basically the introductory statement I had prepared to open things up.

THE COURT: Mr. Jensen, and thank you. And in your comments to me about standing, the question I have for you and I have for your adversaries is, do I parse out the provisions when I look at the issue of standing?

So, for example, subchapter 17 refers to entertainment facilities as designated as "sensitive place."

Do I then parse out a racetrack from a stadium from a theater, or do I just look at the provision broadly? In your comments to me, if you can address that.

MR. JENSEN: Well, I think that may be a question that doesn't necessarily have a pat answer that applies across the board, because certainly some of these areas, you know, arenas, stadiums, theaters, there's not really a real clear basis for drawing a distinction between those categories. It would probably be accurate to call them all "entertainment facilities."

I think perhaps the issue you might be going to here is that we've sort of got two parallel tracks of injury here, right. We've got a list of 25 places where the State has said, all right, if you bring a gun into here, even though you're licensed, et cetera, you're committing a felony, and that results in -- you can characterize that as 25 distinct deprivations. For that matter, you could probably break that list out longer and make it 50 or 100 or 150 places.

THE COURT: Under the plaintiffs' analysis, what's left?

MR. JENSEN: Well, under the plaintiffs' analysis, since we've only challenged those four sensitive places, as well as the vehicle carrier restrictions, everything else is left.

However, and this goes to sort of the second part of this, which is what this is doing in the overall scheme of things, this death-by-a-thousand-cuts scheme.

Once you have enough of these limitations down, you've effectively created a situation where there's really no place left to carry or, to the extent there is a place left to carry, you're talking about having to very carefully map out what you're going to be doing for the next 20 minutes. Are you going to veer off a public sidewalk, for example?

So if you take these four sensitive places and the vehicle carrier restriction that we've challenged, and I think we made this clear on the brief, we're not trying to signal that other areas are permissible. We're really going for the low-hanging fruit here. But just eliminating those categories would open up a fair amount of conduct that isn't opened right now in terms of people actually going about their daily lives and carrying arms.

THE COURT: And that's the key, "with respect to their daily lives."

MR. JENSEN: With respect to their daily lives, because that's the issue we're actually protecting here. And this actually really does tie directly in to standing. Because in putting together this claim that we haven't articulated a claim of concrete injury or imminent injury, what this whole framing of the issue is presupposing is that we're not talking about the right that the Supreme Court has recognized, right. The right to wear, bear, and carry arms upon the person in case of confrontation with another person. We're talking about this much more constricted idea that as long as someone has some theoretical ability to carry a gun somewhere within the state of New Jersey, then the right to bear arms has been protected. And once you drop that constricted view where someone needs to say, okay, well, on this date I would go to this particular location and I would carry a gun and then I would come back home and you make it more about whether or not people have the actual right of armed self-defense, this claim that we haven't articulated a concrete enough injury goes out the window.

You know, one thing I would refer the Court to in this regard is the Seventh Circuit's decision in *Moore versus*Madigan. And in that decision, one thing that Judge Posner did in distinguishing the Second Circuit's prior decision upholding the proper-cause law there was to refute the attempt to connect the Second Amendment in terms of its scope to the right to privacy and this notion that, you know, there's a quote that's been quoted a few times.

Judge Posner disagreed with the suggestion that the Second Amendment should have much greater scope inside the home than outside simply because other provisions of the Constitution have been held to make that distinction.

The interest in having sex inside one's home is much greater than the interest in having sex on the sidewalk in front of one's home, but the interest in self-protection is as great outside as inside the home. And what is, I would say, an unavoidable takeaway of Heller and McDonald and Bruen is that the core interest that is being protected by the Second Amendment is that of armed self-defense.

So then if we dive down into some of the cases that the State is citing in support of this standing argument, you know, for example -- and this we did address in the brief so I'll be concise with it -- Ellison versus American Board of Orthopaedic Physicians.

Well, in the big picture, what we've got -- and I think that if you look at standing decisions over time, you'll see the steam come out -- what exactly a plaintiff needs to have to allege a concrete and imminent injury depends, to a certain extent, on the specific facts at issue. But the big picture idea is the plaintiff needs to have done something to distinguish themselves from just any member of the population. And ideally what they need to have done is they need to have done everything possible to get right up to the point where they would be engaging in this conduct but for the restriction at issue.

So in Ellison, the whole problem was the parties got sidetracked on this question of whether or not he needed to have an actual position with a hospital or needed to apply for admitting privileges and then be told, well, because you haven't taken this test --

THE COURT: Right, which he had not yet done, and so on that grounds I think the --

MR. JENSEN: Well, no. The Court actually said, for purposes of discussion, we're going to accept that it would have been futile to apply for admission privileges because they required this board certification that he couldn't get without, in effect, already having admitting privileges, right? Kind of a circular thing.

What the Court said is he's not admitted to practice medicine in New Jersey. So no matter what, even if we accept this as futile, there's still a significant amount more that he needs to do in order to be at a point where he would be in a position to say, okay, so now the only thing that is holding me back is this restriction that I've challenged in this lawsuit.

I would need to pull up my iPad to give you the cases, but if you go on to the next one or two pages of the State's brief, they go on to cite additional cases where, most significantly, one theme you have is that there's the possibility of an exception, all right.

So let's say that instead of enacting the sensitive place law that it enacted, the New Jersey Legislature said, okay, so we're going to have all these sensitive places, but if you really need to be in one of these places, you could make an application to the State Police or the Attorney General and maybe we'd let you in.

Now, I'm not saying that that sort of a framework would be constitutional; but I am saying that in terms of standing and ripeness, if that's the way the law was set up, I think you'd have a standing and ripeness problem if someone hadn't pursued that option and then been told no.

Now, that's not what we're dealing with here. All of the individual plaintiffs we have in this case have permits to carry. Up until December 22nd, they were carrying. And the only reason they're not carrying right now is because of this law. There is absolutely nothing else that they could do to get closer to crossing that line, the line of the statutes we've challenged, aside from going out and breaking the law.

THE COURT: What evidence do you point to that they will be prosecuted and charged with violating the law if they 2

1
     do go out?
 3
               MR. JENSEN: Well, in terms of evidence, we don't 4
     have any evidence right now aside from the fact that the law 5 has been passed. It's categorized as a serious crime and the defendants are not coming in and disavowing it. Because,
 6
     again, under Steffel versus Thompson and progeny, what we know is that we can't be required to engage in serious criminal
 9 conduct merely to raise a constitutional claim and to say this 10
     law is infringing my rights. But if what we have right now 11 isn't enough, then, effectively, Steffel v. Thompson is out the 12 window because you have no means of challenging this except 13
     saying, okay, I'm now going to carry my gun into the gas 14
     station, please come arrest me and charge me with a felony.
               To state the obvious, people should not have to 15
16
     undergo that kind of a risk in order to simply vindicate their 17 rights.
18
               Well, let me put it this way: I think that basically stakes out the essential parameters of standing.
19 20
               THE COURT:
                           Okay.
21
               MR. JENSEN:
                            I'd be happy to entertain any questions 22
     or otherwise. I'm sure the Court wants to hear from Ms. Cai.
23
               THE COURT:
                           Yes.
                                 Thank you.
24
               Ms. Cai.
25
                            Thank you.

PI is decided.

MS. CAI: Your Honor, would it make sense for me to give a brief opening as well, very briefly, just to set the scene? THE COURT: Yes, if you'd like. MS. CAI: I do think it actually ties into the standing issue, so hopefully it's not too disparate. So in this facial challenge against Chapter 131, plaintiffs are making the extraordinary request of asking this Court to short-circuit the typical procedural process for legal challenges. And that legal process typically, as it happens, exists for a reason. It's because the development of a record through discovery and fact-finding, both on jurisdictional issues and on merits issues, adequate timing for briefing of dispositive legal arguments, and the Court's careful evaluation of the law as applied to the facts are all very crucial. THE COURT: And do you agree with me, Ms. Cai, that if I were to allow that process -- to endorse your argument, your position, that that would, in effect, mean that the plaintiffs would not be permitted to or would be deprived of carrying their firearms for perhaps years while this works through the process? MS. CAI: So two points at that, Your Honor. first, we're here on a TRO. So I think the time of whatever this Court's decision impact is is from now until whenever the

THE COURT: No. But you've asked -- my understanding of your argument is, is that nothing should be done until this entire matter works its way through what you call the democratic process. That democratic process could take years; could it not? MS. CAI: It depends, Your Honor. It depends on the discovery schedule and all that's said and whether or not it's dispositive motions very early on or not. THE COURT: Okav. MS. CAI: I will say, though, it's the plaintiffs' burden at the TRO stage and the PI stage to demonstrate, more than just on allegation, that they are entitled to emergency relief specifically for the period for which they're seeking relief. THE COURT: Okay. And so for right now, we're just looking at MS. CAI: the period between the TRO and the PI. THE COURT: Okay. So I interrupted you in your opening statement, so go ahead. MS. CAI: No; that's quite all right. And I think in this case, plaintiffs bring a challenge to a state law but also on Second Amendment grounds, which, by its very nature, especially after the Bruen decision, requires a special kind of development and careful examination of historical evidence to satisfy the Supreme Court's text and history-based approach.

When we get to the merits, I think it will become clear to the Court that, one, the State has carried its burden. But, two, as the reply from the plaintiffs that came in a couple days ago shows, some of their misconceptions of what those historical pieces of evidence actually say and don't say requires a much more careful reading and takes a lot longer than a rushed rush to judgment that the plaintiffs are putting before this Court would suggest. And I do want to get through that. But I did want to start with the Court's inquiry on standing.

And I think a couple things are undisputed. undisputed, I think, that plaintiffs bear the burden and that burden on a PI posture or TRO posture is more than just relying on the allegations in the Complaint. And so we are not asking this Court at this time to dismiss their Complaint for lack of What we are arguing is plaintiffs come to this Court seeking extraordinary relief. They have a very high bar to proffer evidence on all of the elements. And on each element of standing they have not done so. That's not to say it is impossible for them to do so. They could possibly cure some of the deficiencies that I want to go through. Perhaps they can't. I don't know. And so that's the process that I think would be required, even on a PI posture. And that may take And if they are unable to do that on the PI time, too. posture, then we go on to whether or not even their allegations are deficient and all that.

So we put forward three separate and I think they're pretty independent standing problems. And I want to go through each of them a little bit separately. Some of them will be intertwined. And I think Your Honor was maybe hoping for a provision-by-provision breakdown of which arguments apply to which, and I'll try to signpost that to the best that I can. Some of them are generally applicable across all of their claims, and some of them are more applicable to specific claims than others.

THE COURT: Well, the one that comes to -- the one that I think is distinguishable -- and I meant to ask

Mr. Jensen about this, and I'll get back to it -- is the libraries and museums. I didn't see in the declarations where -- I think for one of the plaintiffs he had visited a museum armed, I think. But I don't know of any intent to visit a public museum or library in the near future.

However, the other provision seemed to me to be so broadly defined; that doesn't plaintiff make a legitimate argument that because they are so broadly defined, that they pretty much can't go anywhere in the state of New Jersey without their weapon?

MS. CAI: I don't think they've met that burden, Your Honor, in what they've offered to the Court. And I'm sort of harping back to the burden, but I think it's important at this stage, we can't just presume things to be true. The plaintiff has to proffer some evidence. They don't have to prove their evidence, although the State is entitled to cross-examine them on whether or not that's appropriate.

I do think there are some provisions for which the deficiency is far more lacking than others. And I can go through them bit by bit.

THE COURT: Okay.

MS. CAI: So it seems like, you know, it was the first deficiency I was going to start with, which is the -- what I call the lack-of-imminent-injury problem. And so I want to clarify something. Mr. Jensen was talking about his clients as people who have carry permits and perhaps separate from the general public. That solves a particularized injury problem. So Article III injury has to be both concrete -- or it's three things: concrete, particularized to the individual, and imminent.

Our issue in this part of the argument is on the imminence problem, not the particularized problem.

I do understand that his clients are able to carry firearms concealed in ways that people who don't have conceal permits don't. And so it's not about whether or not they have taken the step of obtaining a concealed carry permit. That's not the problem. The problem is the imminence of the injury.

So, for example, plaintiffs challenge the restrictions on firearms carry at public libraries and museums, entertainment facilities, places that serve alcohol, vehicle restrictions, including public transit and private vehicles. But nowhere in their declarations do they put forward anything saying anything about their future imminent intent to visit these places. No plaintiff has said anything about future intent to visit a library or museum. They also haven't said anything about intentions to in the future visit a movie theater or an entertainment facility. They could easily do that if they were to say, for example, I —

THE COURT: But isn't it enough for the plaintiff to have to say that this is my daily routine, I typically get up, I go to a restaurant, I go to a hardware store, I go to all of these various different places, this is my ordinary routine, and I should be permitted, because I have a license to conceal carry, to take my firearm with me, but because the statute is so broadly defined, I'm leaving my firearm at home.

It seems to me what the State is saying is that each plaintiff should be able to say, okay, tomorrow when I get up, I'm going to go to Lowe's because I'm going to go home and paint my house, and then after that I might go join a friend for lunch at Applebee's, and then after that I may have to then run because I need something else at Home Depot.

It seems to me the State is asking the plaintiffs to do that. What do you say?

MS. CAI: So the State is not asking for a day-by-day, hour-by-hour or future intention. What the plaintiff is missing -- plaintiffs are missing in their allegations is any statement about future intent. And especially on the TRO posture. We're talking about an injunction for a matter of days or weeks. We don't know how frequently any particular plaintiff intends to visit a restaurant that serves alcohol, for example, or how frequently they would be going to a movie theater. THE COURT: But isn't once enough? MS. CAI: No, Your Honor. THE COURT: Why do you say "frequently"? MS. CAI: Because if there is no concrete plan to visit, for example, a movie theater in the next month or two, they don't have adequate standing to ask this Court to enjoin that provision because they will not be harmed in any Article III way. THE COURT: Well, and then that gets to my first question that I asked Mr. Jensen is, do I parse out the various provisions in the statute?

Do I say, okay, I've looked at the declarations of the plaintiffs and nowhere do they talk about, well, I want to go see the next movie. Therefore, movie theaters, they haven't shown standing as to movie theaters. But they do say that they regularly meet their friends at a restaurant that serves alcohol, so there they've showed standing. Is that the analysis that I engage in?

MS. CAI: I think you do, right. Because I think each plaintiff has to show -- has to demonstrate standing as to each of the claims they're bringing.

THE COURT: Well, how do -- so we're kind of jumping around, but then how do you define entertainment facilities?

MS. CAI: So --

not sure, we could talk about that.

THE COURT: Doesn't that depend upon what people view to be entertainment? Does that include a concert in a church?

MS. CAI: Your Honor, I think if there are as applied questions that pertain to a particular plaintiff, like they're

I don't think there is any question, though, that plaintiffs are challenging the entertainment facility provision as it applies, and the statute makes this clear, does apply to theaters, stadiums, museums, racetracks, arenas, and other places where performances, concerts, exhibits, games or contests are held. And so that's a pretty defined set of places.

THE COURT: No. Ms. Cai, but what you're asking — it seems to me what you're saying is that this Court, in order to find that the plaintiffs have standing, would have to parse through the plaintiffs' declarations to see if, and if they did, what they had concrete plans to do. That's how I'm understanding your argument to me.

MS. CAI: Yes. And that argument comes straight from the Supreme Court's decision in Lujan. So plaintiff's claimed injury in that case was obviously different from what it is here. It's the inability to view endangered species that they claim would be further imperiled by the regulation they're challenging.

THE COURT: Okay. So then under your argument, do you agree then that if each plaintiff has averred that wherever they go, they go by car, that satisfies standing as to the subchapter dealing with transportation?

MS. CAI: I think that would be true, Your Honor. I think the affidavits are even lacking on that part. Now, it may be very easily fixable, but it is still the plaintiffs' burden at this stage to do that.

I will note that as to Section 7(b)(1), which applies to both public and private vehicles, no plaintiff has alleged, even in the past, that they've ridden public transit and certainly no future intention to do so.

I also want to point out that the Supreme Court has been very clear that allegation of past injury or past, you know, past visits to certain locations standing alone without averments of future imminent intent is not enough to satisfy the imminent injury requirement.

And so, again, these are not necessarily things that would be necessarily difficult for a plaintiff to demonstrate. There are some plaintiffs who seem to aver that they are unlikely to ever visit a museum, a movie theater, or public transit. So, for example, the Muller affidavit at paragraph 11 suggests that this person is very unlikely to visit those places according to what he's already testified to. Other plaintiffs may have an easier time. We're just submitting to the Court that on this posture, the plaintiffs have not met their burden in the rushed affidavits that they submitted to this Court.

We are not saying that the Court should dismiss the Complaint because it could never satisfy that burden. So that's on just one of the three standing problems I wanted to talk about.

The second standing problem, which I didn't really hear Mr. Jensen talk about, is demonstrating that Chapter 131 is actually the cause of any injury that they allege. So this, I mean, the Supreme Court has recognized that traceability and redressability are very related in the causation context. And so a good example I think to illustrate this is entertainment facilities, for example.

So plaintiffs say I want to be able to go to concerts and performances and all that, and Chapter 131 should be enjoined because it says that I can't carry my firearm at those venues.

The problem is many, if not most, large entertainment facilities and some movie theaters already, by their own policies, prohibit firearms.

So plaintiffs' challenged Chapter 131 on a facial posture asking this Court to invalidate the statute. But the statute is not the but-for cause of their claimed injury, even if they can get over the imminence requirement that we were just talking about. And so that's the problem for all of the -- well, most of the places that they're challenging. So libraries, entertainment venues, at least some of the private enterprises they're going to that have made it clear on their own websites or on their doors that firearms are not allowed. So the YMCA, for example, Costco, perhaps the local coffee shop. There's no evidence that these places would allow plaintiffs to carry with a firearm. And, in fact, some of them already have existing policies prohibiting weapons. So that's one of the problems that plaintiff has never provided this Court a satisfying answer to.

It could also be overcome with more specific evidence at the PI stage. So, for example, one of the plaintiffs says I want to be able to carry at my local coffee shop or my local YMCA. If they have an affidavit from the coffee shop owner or whoever runs the YMCA that but for Chapter 131 you would be allowed to carry here, then, yes, they have demonstrated causation on that point.

               THE COURT: So the State is suggesting that the 2 plaintiffs must lay out how they intend to spend the rest of 3
     their lives for the next several months -- 4
               MS. CAI: No, Your Honor.
 5
               THE COURT: -- to establish standing?
 6
               MS. CAI:
                        No, Your Honor. I think they just need to 7
     give at least one example for each category, each provision 8
     that they're challenging, that they're actually intending to go 9
     to.
10
               THE COURT: So the State's position -- I want to make 11 sure I understand your position. The State's position is that 12
     the plaintiff must, if they're going to challenge each subpart 13 or each provision, must at least satisfy standing as to one of 14
     the categories; is that the position?
15
               MS. CAI: Yeah.
16
               THE COURT:
                           Okav.
17 Because they need to have some injury to
               MS. CAI:
18
     challenge the provision at issue, to make the claim at issue.
19
               And I will fully acknowledge that the 20
     but-for-causation problem in this part of the standing 21 challenge almost certainly does not apply to the plaintiff's 22 own vehicle, right? They don't need to show that because but 23 for the statute, they've demonstrated that they would be 24 carrying loaded guns in their automobiles.
25 Okay. So you concede standing as to
               THE COURT:

1 subchapter 7, the transportation, (d). 2 MS. CAI: Not standing in general, Your Honor, but on 3 this, the causation part of standing. 4 THE COURT: Well, how do you quarrel with the fact 5 that each plaintiff rides his -- each declaration discusses how 6 when they go places they get in the car. How do you quarrel 7 with that standing? 8 MS. CAI: There's a different -- this is the third --9 the third problem with standing is the credible likelihood of 10 enforcement. 11 THE COURT: Okay. 12 MS. CAI: So that's what I wanted to get to. 13 THE COURT: Okay. MS. CAI: And so I think that the issue there is the 14 15 Supreme Court has been clear and this Court, as affirmed by the 16 Third Circuit in cases like Fischer, have made clear that the 17 mere existence of a law is not sufficient to demonstrate 18 credible likelihood of enforcement. 19 It's not the case that the plaintiff has to be 20

It's not the case that the plaintiff has to be prosecuted, but the plaintiff has to do more. And in SBA List, the Supreme Court case, the Court gave three ways of getting there. One is past history of enforcement. Two is any kind of specific threat of enforcement against a plaintiff or similarly situated person.

23

24

25

The third is some other operation of the statute that makes it especially easy for enforcement. So, for example, a citizens suit provision is the example that the Supreme Court gave. Plaintiffs have not even tried to meet this burden. They have not tried to demonstrate any of this.

THE COURT: Well, let me ask you this: Is the State willing to agree not to prosecute each of these plaintiffs?

MS. CAI: No. And that's not what the requirement is, right. So --

THE COURT: So then help me understand when the threat of prosecution becomes credible.

MS. CAI: So if, for example, plaintiffs adduced any evidence about how the State had previously enforced sensitive places restrictions and places like government buildings, schools, et cetera, they haven't done any of that. And I think if you think about the claim by claim, there are some claims for which the credible threat of enforcement issue becomes very crystallized, and so the private property restriction is one of them.

So plaintiffs say, well, everything is likely to be enforced because the statute has been passed and law enforcement says we enforce all of our statutes, right. But the problem is, think about the commonsense scenario that that provision would provide. If a plaintiff carries a concealed firearm on to private property and the owner hasn't indicated one way or the other whether or not they consent —

THE COURT: He's in violation of the law.

MS. CAI: But it's not clear how that would be enforced, and it's not clear that the threat of enforcement would be that credible, and here's why --

THE COURT: Well, I just asked you if the State was willing not to enforce the laws and you would not concede that. So the law, the default is, is that unless the owner has consented, and in the scenario that you're positing, in that case the owner hasn't consented, then under the law, the gun owner violates the law, right?

MS. CAI: That's --

THE COURT: Should he wait for the police to come arrest him before there's a credible threat of prosecution?

MS. CAI: No, Your Honor. No, Your Honor. But the issue is how it's enforced.

So one scenario is the owner, upon seeing the plaintiff with the concealed weapon — I'm not sure how that would even happen. A lot of times perhaps the owner wouldn't even know — is actually okay with having it on their property all along. They just haven't expressed their consent either way. This is what the plaintiffs are worried about, right, people who are fine or don't really care about you bringing your firearm but haven't expressed consent. I think it's very unlikely that that private owner would be calling the police to enforce the provision against the plaintiff.

THE COURT: What evidence do you have to support that?

MS. CAI: The burden is not on the State to support that. But I think it's common sense to say if I am a person who is perfectly fine with others bringing firearms onto my property, I just haven't told that person, if a person happens to do that in violation of the technical law on my own property, but I'm not willing, as most people probably are, to pick up the phone or do anything about it, that's going to be, admittedly, difficult for the State to enforce, especially because it's on private property.

And so that's an example of why I think the burden, you know, plaintiffs have to satisfy their burden. And maybe it's a little bit easier with respect to carrying at a large stadium where it would be more likely that law enforcement will see you do it or whatever. But with respect to private property I think it's harder to know. And if the --

THE COURT: But under your analysis, what is the plaintiff to do? It's the plaintiff's burden, I agree with you on that. Is the plaintiff supposed to present evidence that he went up to ten different property owners and even though there was no sign that said you can have a gun here, that they were all okay with it? I mean, I'm not sure I'm following your argument.

MS. CAI: No. I think it would have to be something more specific. And I don't want to lay out a roadmap for how plaintiffs would cure their own standing deficiencies, but perhaps any examples of other enforcement in this area that could shed light on how likely the enforcement is.

THE COURT: But the law was just enacted. So how can you criticize plaintiffs for not coming forward with such evidence? I guess that is what is troubling to me; that in the cases of standing that you are discussing, there, there is a historical pattern.

So, for example, in some of the cases, the plaintiff lacks standing because though there's been a statute on the books for 20 years, it's never been prosecuted, right?

So do you quarrel with the plaintiffs' position that they have every right to believe that they will be prosecuted if they are found to be in violation of the provision?

MS. CAI: Of course not, Your Honor. I mean, the State would never say we're not going to enforce, you know, a duly enacted criminal law unless there was some other specific circumstance at stake.

THE COURT: Okay.

MS. CAI: I'm just saying that as the Supreme Court and other cases, including the Sixth Circuit and the Third Circuit, have said, the plaintiffs' burden is to say more than the law exists and there's no disavowal of enforcement. And how they choose to do that, whether it's through history of enforcement of similar statutes or through an example of a similarly situated person who has been enforced against, that's up to them. And if they would like to do that, we can evaluate the evidence and see if it reaches the threshold.

And I think, you know, in cases like Kendrick, which is a DNJ decision that cited to D.C. Circuit case law on this issue, as well as the recent Angelo decision of the D.C. Circuit, there is a real issue on this point. And this applies to all of their claims because the burden on the plaintiff for challenging a newly enacted law is to demonstrate that specific provisions that they fear enforcement of will actually be likely to be applied to them and enforced against them.

THE COURT: And just to be clear, that wasn't a D.C. Circuit decision.

MS. CAI: Sorry. District of D.C., citing D.C. Circuit law, yes.

THE COURT: And that seemed to rely upon D.C. Circuit law that really, I think, is distinguishable from this Court's precedence.

MS. CAI: There are different ways of looking at it, Your Honor. And I think the D.C. Circuit in those cases have gone even further to say you actually need to be prosecuted, which is not our position here. But I think, you know, the Supreme Court in SBA List, the Sixth Circuit in the McKay case and other cases and other courts have recognized the three-part factor. You know, it doesn't have to be all three but one of the three additional proffers that the plaintiff has to give.

And I think especially at the PI posture where, you know, a quasi-summary judgment standard is the standard, the plaintiff has to do more than just say the law exists. And so unless the Court has any other questions on standing...

THE COURT: Thank you.

All right. Mr. Jensen, you want to respond.

MR. JENSEN: Yes, Your Honor.

THE COURT: Yes.

MR. JENSEN: I'll try to be brief.

So, first and foremost, we're not talking — as the Court has already recognized, we're talking about a law that was just enacted. There's not going to be a history of enforcement and a requirement that you must show a history of enforcement to show imminence, particularly in the context of newly enacted legislation, is going to create a situation where the legislation is simply not reviewable, which is not the end goal of the standing statutes. It's to ensure that we have particularized controversies that are susceptible to determination by the courts.

And moreover, this is not a mere technical violation. We're not talking about something like driving five miles per hour over the speed limit where maybe they'll pull you over, maybe they won't; and if they do, you're going to get handed a piece of paper that says write a check for 50 or $100. We're talking about serious criminal statutes where the result is going to be someone is going to be arrested, they are going to be held in jail unless and until they make bail, and they are going to face a serious threat of a term of imprisonment.

A couple of the cases that we're referencing, you know, in particular, Kendrick, I was local counsel on that case, the issue there was the plaintiffs were challenging parameters related to the permitting process. They hadn't applied for permits. Now, whether or not that was rightly decided based on the particular claims they were putting forward is debatable. But long story short, that's not what we're dealing with here.

We're not dealing with -- and I still haven't heard any specific thing that any of the plaintiffs could do to get themselves closer to the line than they already are. They've already passed all of the processes they would need to pass to be able to engage in that conduct.

THE COURT: What about your adversary's position that the plaintiffs have to sort of lay out their concrete plans, I guess, as they see their life unfolding for the next several days or weeks?

MR. JENSEN: I normally try to avoid answering questions with questions, but take this as a rhetorical question. When's the next time you're going to a movie theater?

People's lives do not necessarily lay out into a scheduling book that run six months or a year or however long into the future.

What the plaintiffs are saying here is that when they were able to -- and if they were now able to, they would continue to do this -- when they were able to, they carried guns with them throughout their daily lives. Sometimes that might involve going to museums. Sometimes that might involve going to restaurants or gas stations or where have you.

Requiring a higher level of specificity or concreteness than that is basically turning the right of armed self-defense on its head.

THE COURT: Although I didn't see anything in the declarations -- and you'll correct me if I'm wrong -- that the plaintiffs intended to visit libraries and museums, and maybe I missed it.

MR. JENSEN: I don't think anyone said I have a definite plan right now to go to the Sussex County Library or what have you next week.

THE COURT: Because not everybody is a library-goer and not everybody is a museum-goer. So to that, the State might have a point.

MR. JENSEN: Well, but the real issue here is what's the injury? And the injury is deprivation of the right to armed self-defense. And the issue is, does that right attach to you as an individual that then subject you to specific justified limitations, or does the right in the first place only come up in particular locations.

They're trying to put forward a view where this is a right that only comes up in particular locations. As long as you have some ability to carry a gun in some manner within the geographic confines of New Jersey, the right to bear arms is being protected. But that's not what the right of armed self-defense entails. It entails the ability to actually be able to protect one's self when the need for defense arises. And this in and of itself ties back into this "sensitive places" issue. Because one of the defining characteristics of sensitive places, like this courthouse, is you're not too likely to need a firearm to defend yourself. If someone attacks me right now, we've got, I don't know, at least one CSO in the room. I think a bunch more would probably come in pretty quick, all right.

That is distinguishable from going to a museum or library, and the basis for distinction doesn't relate to how frequently someone goes there. It relates to whether, if they are going to go there, that need is going to arise.

One other thing that I think should be addressed just briefly, Fischer versus Governor of New Jersey, which I believe actually went up to the Third Circuit out of this Court, so you may actually be more familiar with the facts than I am, but stated generally the plaintiffs in Fischer are challenging a New Jersey law that governs withdrawal from a public sector union, specifically a teacher's union. The New Jersey statute says you've got to request withdrawal from the union within ten days of your anniversary date. And the plaintiffs are saying, under the Supreme Court decision, that's unconstitutional.

The problem is, the way that this had actually worked out for all the plaintiffs is that their union rules let them withdraw earlier, and they had withdrawn earlier. So then you do get into a question of, well, just because the statute is on the books doesn't mean it's being applied to you. How do you have standing? That is apples and oranges from what we are dealing with here.

THE COURT: Okay.

MR. JENSEN: And beyond that, the only other thing I can say is that I think that the Court has accurately identified the issue with, in particular, the Naviguard decision out of the D.C. Circuit where the reality is we've got a circuit split.

I don't think that line of authority will ultimately prevail because I think particularly when you get up to the Supreme Court level, this notion that people should have standing without having to risk getting sent to prison is going to be persuasive with the Court. But long story short, I think there are one or two outcomes you get out of the D.C. Circuit that you would not get out of the Third Circuit.

So unless the Court has anything further...

THE COURT: No. Let's turn to -- I want to get to irreparable injury, and we'll do that at the end. But I want to turn to the "sensitive place" designations, and I want to do them by -- I want to focus -- I want to skip past the subpart 12. I want to turn to subpart 15 just briefly, and 17, and then I want to talk to you about the private property.

You know what, let me just hear you as to "sensitive place" designation all along, and we'll keep the transportation, the vehicle one, for a separate conversation.

Okay. Go ahead.

MR. JENSEN: Okay. So what we know under — to start this conversation off, we need to talk about what the framework of review is, right? So under Bruen, which is really primarily where we're going to be looking to to find out how do we evaluate these restrictions, the starting premise is, if something falls within the scope of the Second Amendment, meaning we are talking about the act of keeping or bearing arms, it is presumptively unconstitutional unless the government bears the burden of identifying a historical analogue that amounts to what could be called and what, in fact, the Court did call an enduring tradition, an enduring American tradition.

Now, one issue that has already come up quite a bit on the briefing is precisely what period we're looking at. And when you look at Bruen around -- I want to say this is roughly page 2133, 2134 --

THE COURT: Well, I think that we can skip that conversation now. And I don't really want to delve into it.

Because, as in Bruen, it didn't matter to the Supreme Court's decision whether or not you looked at the 1791 period or you looked at the 1868 period, right, under the Bruen decision?

MR. JENSEN: Yes, that's correct.

THE COURT: Your argument is the same here.

MR. JENSEN: I think that is the same. But to the extent it does make a difference, what does need to be noted is that in Bruen, the Court directly said we have narrowly looked to 1791 to determine the scope of the Bill of Rights. There is an ongoing academic debate, that term, direct quote. They cite Amar and Khan -- Akhil Amar and K. Lash, and I'm drawing a blank on Lash's first name -- for these articles talking about a somewhat novel theory that when the Fourteenth Amendment was adopted, it basically reenacted the entire Bill of Rights. So maybe for the entire ten original protections, we ought to be looking at 1868 instead of 1791.

THE COURT: And let's not get bogged down in that conversation.

MR. JENSEN: Okay.

1 THE COURT: Yes. 2 MR. JENSEN: I think we made the point, so let's not 3 get bogged down in it. 4 THE COURT: Understood. 5 MR. JENSEN: So let's look at -- so with regard to 6 15, first of all, let's start at the manner in which the 7 statute has articulated it. And this is bars and restaurants that serve alcohol and, paraphrasing, other places where 8 9 alcohol is available or is sold for consumption on premises, 10 okay. 11 And the way that the State is characterizing this, which it's a direct quote, locations where vulnerable or 12 13 incapacitated people gather, which I don't really know that 14 that's an entirely accurate way to describe restaurants. 15 What we have under Bruen to start out with is the 16 State of New York argued that any place where people gather and 17 where law enforcement is presumptively available ought to fall 18 under the guise of a sensitive place. The Supreme Court 19 emphatically rejected that. So whatever we have as a starting 20 premise, we pretty much know that if what the justification is 21 is that, well, hey, people gather here and if you call the 22 police, they'll presumably show up --23 THE COURT: Well, I think there are two principles, 24 if not more, that Bruen was clear on. One is that the sensitive place designation should not be so expansive, and

1 cautioned courts against expanding the definition of sensitive 2 place. You agree with that? 3 MR. JENSEN: Yes. The other principle is exactly the one 4 THE COURT: 5 that you articulated. Because otherwise, according to the 6 Supreme Court, the city of Manhattan becomes designated a 7 sensitive place. 8 MR. JENSEN: Correct. 9 THE COURT: Okay. And so in that vein, your argument 10 is? 11 MR. JENSEN: Well, okay, so let's call that context. The simple fact that people gather in an area is not going to 12 13 be enough to make it a sensitive place. And frankly, that sort 14 of has to be the case because ultimately people gather there. 15 Look, people gather in public places. That's kind of the 16 definition of a public place, right. 17 So with regard to restaurants and bars that serve 18 alcohol, the State's identified three laws. And I will follow 19 the Court's admonition not to get bogged down in the details, 20 but it should be noted, not one of these is from anything close 21 to 1791, all right. 22 So, first of all, we've got an 1870 Texas law, and 23 what that law actually prohibited was going into any church or 24 religious assembly, any schoolroom or other place where people are assembled for educational, literary, or scientific purposes 25 or into a ballroom, social party, or other social gathering composed of ladies and gentlemen, or to any election precinct on the day or days of any election, or to any other place where people may be assembled to muster or to perform any other public duty or any other public assembly.

By its terms, this does not cover restaurants. It does not, for that matter, cover bars. And any attempt to convert this into something that might cover restaurants and bars requires us to sort of read a lot in there that basically goes, well, so we're talking about places where people assemble or they gather. But that would just be going back to do you have a right to bear arms in public in the first place. And there are probably two notes that should be thrown out there with regard to this Texas law. One is that the law was amended a year later to strike out the reference to literary purposes.

The second is that in the grand scheme of things,

Texas was one of at least two states that had rejected a view of the right to bear arms. Now, this is the right to bear arms

as stated under the Texas Constitution that as a general proposition applied to handguns in the first place. So restrictions that are being upheld in Texas at this time period are not really particularly pertinent because this is this whole line of authority that the Supreme Court rejected in Heller in the first place.

THE COURT: So, Mr. Jensen, and you've made all of those arguments in your brief, so to move things along, I don't want you to have to reiterate what's in your brief. I understand the positions you've taken with respect to the statutes that the defendants have cited, and I have some questions for them about that.

And we're only going to focus now on 15 and 17.

Anything else in your brief that you want to add?

MR. JENSEN: Well, okay. So let me just on 15, I will hit these two points very quickly.

MR. JENSEN: The other two laws that are being cited, 1859 Connecticut, this doesn't have anything to do with restricting carrying guns. It says you can't sell alcohol or have a gambling facility within either a half a mile or a mile of a military encampment. I don't know. General Order No. 1 generally says you can't drink while you're on duty, right. The military's ability to prohibit alcohol use or restrict alcohol use by members of the service is kind of not what we're talking about here.

And then finally, this 1867 Kansas law says you can't be intoxicated. All right. Section 5 of this new legislation already says you can't be intoxicated while carrying a gun. We're not challenging that. I don't think anyone in their right mind is going to assert a constitutional right to walk around drunk and armed.

With regard to 17, entertainment facilities, well, we're starting out with the Statute of Northampton. The big issue there is — and believe me, plenty of ink has been spilled on the issue of the Statute of Northampton over the past 12 years. The Supreme Court has resolved this.

THE COURT: Right. And in your brief you refer to the Statute of Northampton, but actually the statute that the State cites was actually addressed by the Supreme Court.

MR. JENSEN: Well, yes. It was a state analogue to the Statute of Northampton.

THE COURT: Yes. Okay.

MR. JENSEN: And significantly, if you start doing research in Virginia case law, you really won't find anything that construes this. So all we really have to go from is the established common law meaning of the statute at the time of the framing or any other time that might be material.

And notably, while we're not going to find authority in Virginia that addresses this, there is some authority from other states. I believe State v. Huntley from North Carolina addressed this issue, the Statute of Northampton and a phrase, "liability" for a phrase, by explaining that the general act of possessing or carrying a gun did not come within the statute in the first place.

We've got that same 1870 Texas law that we're just talking about, which, again, the only way you're going to get this into an entertainment venue is simply by saying, well, the premise here is that any place where people assemble, guns can be banned. But that premise has already pretty much been rejected.

And more to the point, you know, one of the things that, I think, even if I'm right and this Civil War era stuff isn't really directly pertinent, one thing we do really get from Bruen is that in looking at analogous laws, they found five laws from the 1860s generally from territories and oftentimes they weren't enforced for very long, but on their face, they broadly precluded the carry of guns. A lot of times it was just within the confines of an organized town or city.

But the fact that you could locate one or two or in that case five laws that stood for the proposition or that embraced this restriction wasn't enough to show an enduring American tradition. And if you stop and think about this, you know, take one step back from the situation and look at this from the framework of, well, what should the law be, if you're defining constitutional rights based on what we could call the low water mark or the lowest common denominator, meaning if you look through the history of the country, where is an example where we can find this right either hasn't been observed or has been winnowed down to nothing, well, we wouldn't have any rights. People would cite Korematsu and they would say it's fine for the government to make race- or ethnicity-based

1 distinctions. 2 And that is part of why -- a significant part of why 3 the mere fact that someone can point to a law that is arguably 4 analogous here isn't enough. We need to be able to show that 5 there was actually an enduring tradition that supported this 6 regulation. 7 THE COURT: Okay. Let me hear from your adversary, 8 please. 9 MR. JENSEN: You bet. 10 THE COURT: Okay. 11 So, Ms. Cai, I really want to move on to the privately owned property. But do you have anything else to add 12 13 to your submissions with respect to 15 and 17, the 14 entertainment provision and the alcohol provision? Do you have 15 anything else to add? 16 MS. CAI: I do, Your Honor. 17 THE COURT: Okay. 18 MS. CAI: I think --19 THE COURT: And in your comments, though, because one 20 of the questions I do want you to address is, I understand the 21 State to be saying that the conduct at issue here is not 22 covered by the Second Amendment, and so that is a question I 23 most certainly want you to address. Okay. 24 MS. CAI: With respect to places that -- so Section 25 15 and Section 17, generally speaking, we don't make a text of the Second Amendment argument unless the entertainment facility is operated by the government as a market participant, as actually many of the largest venues in New Jersey are. So PNC Bank Art Center, for example, is a government-run facility. So that's the only distinction I'm making on the first step Bruen inquiry about the text. That argument I'll save for the other provisions where that's much more applicable.

THE COURT: Okay.

MS. CAI: So on the historical analogue, so starting with I guess we're talking about entertainment facilities, I think what's notable is the State provided five or six historical analogues specifically prohibiting firearms at not just places where people assemble, but crowded places for social or entertainment or ballrooms, the kind of things, the specific kind of things that Section 17 prohibits. And so if you want to find a almost historical twin, there are a number of them that we've identified. And plaintiffs have —

MS. CAI: Yeah, absolutely. We don't have to do that for everyone. I'm just saying even if — the plaintiffs are asking in a lot of cases for, well, this is not close enough. They haven't given anything about why the examples we gave on entertainment facilities are not close enough. And so that may be a question for some of the other provisions. But I think as to entertainment facilities, we have identified very, very direct historical analogues that they haven't challenged.

I think one thing that sort of illustrates my earlier point about sort of hasty TRO proceedings is what the plaintiffs were trying to argue in their reply brief on the Tennessee statute that is in our Exhibit 8, the 1869 Tennessee statute. So they say this statute allowed open carry, so you shouldn't consider it. That's plain wrong from the text. And I have a copy of the statute if the Court wants to look at it, and I can walk through it.

But the statute literally says: "It shall not be lawful for any person attending any fair, racecourse, or other public assembly of the people to carry on his person, concealed or otherwise, any pistol or any other deadly or dangerous weapon."

THE COURT: What exhibit is that?

MS. CAI: This is Exhibit 8. And I'm happy to --

THE COURT: I have a copy of it.

MS. CAI: And I think --

THE COURT: May I? I want to get to this. The State has throughout its papers told this Court not to make a hasty decision. And of course, this Court would never make a hasty decision. But the State has done so saying we promise we'll give you the historical evidence to support this legislation.

But when this legislation was passed, the legislature said we have plenty of historical evidence to support this

                   So it's there. What more time do you need?
     legislation.
 2
     been there.
 3
               MS. CAI:
                        It's certainly there, Your Honor.
 4
     that's why we provided the Court with, you know, I think 20 5 historical exhibits demonstrating -- 6
               THE COURT:
                           Is that all you have?
 7
                        It's not though, Your Honor, because -- 8
                          But if you had more -- is this all that 9
     the legislature had?
10
               MS. CAI: I -- I can't know exactly what the legislators were looking at. I can't get into their minds or 11 12 their research, but -- 13
               THE COURT: Well, I'm looking at the plain language 14 of the statute. I'm looking at the plain language of the 15 legislation that says that these laws are rooted in historical 16 evidence and supported. I don't have the language right in 17 front of me, but the legislation itself says that historical 18 tradition supports this legislation.
19
               So it seems to me that the legislature has had this 20 evidence at the time of passage. And for the State to come 21 forward to me today and say we need more time to show you the 22 legislation, the legislature said they had it.
23
               MS. CAI: So the argument is not that the State needs 24 more time to come up with historical analogues.
25
               THE COURT:
                           Okay.

The argument is historical evidence is MS. CAI: oftentimes tricky. What do particular phrases mean at the moment in history that they existed? THE COURT: Okay. MS. CAI: Is there other context supporting that particular understanding of what these statutes meant? I mean, this is the work of historians. And the State -- I'm sure the legislature had many of these in mind. I can't purport to know exactly which ones they did or didn't. And there's also a whole doctrine where exactly what the legislature had in mind is not necessarily what justifies the law. But in any event, I think the key is as demonstrated by plaintiffs' attempt to challenge the State's historical analogues with misreadings of what the statutes actually say, and there are other scenarios where perhaps the readings are ambiguous or debatable, those are the kinds of conversations and factual development that needs to happen in the normal course of litigation. And so I think it's -- and the other thing that I think needs to happen --THE COURT: Although this Court's perfectly capable of reading the statute and construing it as well. Do you agree with that? MS. CAI: Of course. Of course. But I think there's something about historical statutes that's a little bit different because the way in which people used certain phrases, for example, or what led to the establishment of certain statutes and how they were adopted by other municipalities or other states, you know, does figure into the analysis.

I will note that at no time in this submission does the State rely on purely territorial laws or any territorial laws. We are only relying on state statutes or local provisions that existed in U.S. states at the time.

And so on entertainment facilities, I mean, I think there's plenty of historical tradition to support this. The other thing I would note is that I think plaintiffs' discussion of what Bruen said about sensitive places and what an enduring historical tradition analysis requires is a little bit off base.

So what Bruen said explicitly is that you can't say all of New York is a sensitive place. I mean, we totally agree with that. But it's silent on how expansive one should look at sensitive places because it didn't conduct the historical inquiry into how expansively did the historical tradition look at sensitive places. And that's exactly what we are doing now.

Moreover, I think what's really important is we can look to what Bruen said about places that they thought were settled sensitive places. And Bruen said that although the historical record "yield relatively few 18th and 19th century sensitive places where weapons were altogether prohibited, we are also aware of no disputes regarding the lawfulness of such prohibitions."

So the Court was able to draw conclusions about sensitive places, government buildings and schools, for example, based on relatively few historical analogues because those analogues were not challenged in court. And I think that's the thing that plaintiffs are missing. They have not demonstrated that the analogues that we put forth — sometimes numerous — have ever been challenged at the time or any time close to when they were enacted.

And instead, the State has put forward evidence, at least examples -- and we can do more of this on sort of a more voluminous briefing timeline and briefing pages -- that actually some of these laws were upheld immediately after they were enacted. And so the Texas statute that plaintiffs were talking about is a good example of this.

And so just to focus on that for a little bit, this is the 1870 Texas statute that's in Exhibit 5. You know, the Court in Bruen talked about the Texas court's English versus State decision was incorrect to assume that the Second Amendment right only applied to the militia context. Totally agreed. We're not challenging that. A separate part of that English v. State decision in 1872 talks about sensitive places. And the Bruen court doesn't abrogate this at all. It doesn't talk about this at all.

But the Texas Supreme Court made clear that the legislature can regulate firearms carry in sensitive locations. And, in fact, has said it appears to us, little short of ridiculous, that anyone should claim the right to carry upon his person any of these mischievous devices, for instance, going into a church, a lecture room, a ballroom or any other place where ladies and gentlemen are congregated together.

And so I think nothing about what the plaintiffs are arguing is supported by what Bruen was saying, which is what you look to is what statutes were enacted and how courts and the people understood the lawfulness of those enactments at the time. And so I think that that's what the historical analysis and further briefing will show. But we have put forth examples on a number of these or actually, on all of them.

One final point on places that serve alcohol, and this applies to all the arguments that plaintiffs are making, plaintiffs, the gist of their reply and what Mr. Jensen is coming up here to say is that, well, you need to give like the same statute in history in order for it to be justified. But Bruen said that's not correct. And the Third Circuit in the Range decision said that is absolutely not the right mode of analysis.

Instead, what Bruen and Range tells courts to do is to look at why and how the statute limits firearms. In the alcohol context, it's because alcohol and firearms don't mix.

Now, plaintiffs say well, it's enough to say if you are actively drunk, you can't carry. If that's the line that they are drawing, I think that requires then the State to be limited in every single way to how history — how an 18th century statute or 19th century statute decided to limit that particular form of intoxication. So if in history, drunk meant having a certain level of drunkenness and anything below that is fine, I think plaintiffs would have to come up here by their own logic and say, well, if you're not so drunk, then you can carry. And I think —

THE COURT: No. But I think --

MS. CAI: I'm sorry, Your Honor.

THE COURT: In fairness, the State cites to the Kansas statute to support as evidence of a historical analogue to support subpart 15. But that Kansas statute clearly says as the plaintiff says. It says, intoxicated people can't possess firearms. And I think for the State to say otherwise, the statute is plain on its face. And to ask this Court to delve down below and to do a deep dive into, well, why was that statute enacted, et cetera, et cetera, that seems — no one's quarreling here that intoxicated people shouldn't be possessing firearms.

MS. CAI: I agree that's exactly what the Kansas statute says. But I do think what the Range decision suggests -- says that courts have to do is to delve down into the reason for that restriction and how widely applicable that is.

THE COURT: Okay. I think there we have a disagreement. I think Bruen says explicitly that a district court is not to delve into the utility or the wisdom of a regulation.

MS. CAI: Your Honor, I want to make one point very clear. We are not asking this Court to evaluate the utility of the current regulation. What Bruen says, though, is that courts have to evaluate the how and why of why historical statutes were enacted.

And so, for example, in Range, the plaintiff there argued, well, the historical statutes never say that someone who is convicted of fraud — in this case welfare fraud — could be disarmed. In fact, he pointed to statutes where the prosecutions for embezzlement led to basically taking away all the possessions of an individual except for firearms. And the Third Circuit says we looked to why it is that categories of statutes were enacted. And the category of statutes we look to is that people who have been dishonest and breaking the law were disarmed generally. So we don't look to the provision-by-provision historical twin but rather to why historical analogues were enacted, and we carried that forward to today.

THE COURT: And so your argument with respect to -- let's stick with the Kansas statute, is what?

MS. CAI: The reason that the Kansas statute and similar statutes were enacted is that the legislatures at that time correctly recognized that people who are intoxicated or could be intoxicated or go to places to be intoxicated should not have firearms on them. And so we can't, you know, we're not doing an analysis of whether the current statute, Section 15, is narrowly tailored to only apply to people who have already started drinking at the restaurant versus later. That's not what Bruen tells the Court to do. It's whether or not —

THE COURT: So I guess your argument is, is that it is presumed that anyone who goes into an establishment that sells alcohol is going to drink?

MS. CAI: No, Your Honor. And that's --

THE COURT: But that's how you'd get there.

MS. CAI: No. I don't think that's the logic we're trying to draw. The logic we're trying to draw is historically legislatures have had no problem prohibiting the mixture of alcohol and firearms, period.

Now, the current regime, it's hard to know exactly who started drinking or not at any particular restaurant. And so you may disagree with the policy decision of the current legislature to not make it a certain BAC level or whatever. But the point is, the same animating why laws were enacted is the same for the Kansas law and today, which is that alcohol and firearms do not mix. And I think that's why we're looking at this level of generality, because I think the question, as the Texas decision I just quoted to this Court describes, is the legislature's wisdom about what combinations of alcohol — I'm sorry, of locations and firearms do not mix well is based on, you know, we have historical analogues of legislatures making that determination with respect to alcohol, similarly with respect to social gatherings and large crowds, and so that's why we carried those forward to today.

THE COURT: Okay. All right. Can we turn to, Ms. Cai, I have my questions for you, can we now turn to subpart 17, which is the provision -- not 17. I'm sorry.
Number 24, the private property provision.

MS. CAI: Yes, Your Honor. Did you want me to answer or did you want Mr. Jensen to go?

THE COURT: I do. I think to move things along, I do have some questions. The question I have for you, it seems to me in subpart 24, and this is what I want you to address, is isn't the State turning the presumption of the right to carry on its head?

MS. CAI: No, Your Honor. I think plaintiffs already agree that one does not have a right to carry on other's private property without their consent. And the GeorgiaCarry case from the Eleventh Circuit makes very clear that all of

1 Second Amendment history supports that proposition. 2 THE COURT: Well, let's back up for a second. 3 You agree that a person has a right to carry a 4 firearm on private property unless the person says no? Do you 5 agree with that principle? 6 MS. CAI: I don't necessarily, Your Honor. I think 7 the problem is, well, how do we know whether or not the 8 property owner consents? And that's the whole inquiry for 9 Section 23. 10 THE COURT: Okay. Because that's why -- there is a presumption under the Second Amendment that you have a right to 11 12 bear arms, okay. That presumption carries on to private 13 property. You agree with that? 14 MS. CAI: I think it certainly applies to your own 15 private property and private property where the owner has 16 consented. 17 THE COURT: Why does the owner -- so is the State's 18 argument that there is no presumption to the Second Amendment 19 right to carry? There is no such presumption; is that the 20 State's argument? 21 There is such a presumption in public, and 22 that's the exact language that Bruen and Heller uses, but on 23 someone else's private property, from Blackstone forward, and 24 this is all in the Georgia Carry decision, which plaintiffs 25 don't refute.

1 THE COURT REPORTER: I'm sorry. 2 (Reporter clarified the record.) 3 MS. CAI: In the GeorgiaCarry decision from the 4 Eleventh Circuit. 5 The right to property has always included the right 6 to exclude. And all that Section 24 regulates is how property 7 owners communicate their right to exclude. 8 THE COURT: But why does the State feel the need to 9 tell property owners how to communicate? I mean, putting aside 10 whether or not there are First Amendment concerns. Why does 11 the State feel the need to communicate to private property owners what they must communicate? Because it's well known 12 13 that private properties have every right to post no gun signs, 14 right? 15 MS. CAI: Yes, of course. 16 THE COURT: And that's the state of the existence 17 today; that if a private property owner doesn't want guns on 18 his or her property, he posts "no guns" signs, correct? 19 MS. CAI: But you don't only have to do that, Your 20 So I think that's what the legislature is getting to. You don't have to post a sign. You can communicate that in 21 22 other ways. And --23 THE COURT: Okay. So why does the State have to 24 compel, quote-unquote, a private property owner to post a sign 25 that says you have my express consent?

MS. CAI: So just as a technical, I don't think that there's any compulsion happening here, because the private property owner — so in the opposite of Chapter 131, if it didn't exist, if Section 24 didn't exist and that the opposite regime were in place, a private property owner who didn't want firearms on their property would then be compelled to speak in a certain way, to tell people, everyone who comes in, the plumber, the dishwasher repair person, any customer, all that, I don't want you to have firearms here. That's the alternate regime, or there's confusion about what silence means.

And so what Section 24 does is it tells property owners: If you want your property rights to be exercised in this way, this is what you do, which is, you don't need to say anything, or if you want them to be exercised in this other way, to allow firearms, this is what you do, which is that you say something.

THE COURT: But private property owners -- it's yes or no. Private property owners today know if they don't want guns, they post a "no gun" sign, right?

MS. CAI: I actually don't know if that's true, Your Honor. So Exhibit 21 is an empirical study of what private — of what people believe to be the default rules of what happens or doesn't happen if you don't say anything about firearms carried on your premises. And if you look at the provisions — or the results that we cite from New Jersey, individuals, respondents from New Jersey, a statistically significant sample actually believed that if they don't say anything, you are not allowing the repair person or the customer to come on to their property. And so that's -- I'm not saying that the legislature is necessarily relying on that specific piece of evidence, but we are saying that the reason that the legislature wanted to clarify property owners' communication is to make it clear to property owners how they can exercise their rights in a way that actually fits with their expectations.

THE COURT: But who was confused before? What doesn't make any sense to me, it seems to me that this statute, it seems to me, is compelling private property owners to express a view as to their view on this legislation. Because it says you have to, unless there's a sign that says we consent to guns on our property, then the default is no guns are permitted, right? That's what the statute says. It immediately — if there is no "we consent" sign, it immediately defaults to no guns.

MS. CAI: It does not have to be sign, Your Honor. It could be on your website. It can be --

THE COURT: Okay. Let's stick with the sign so it's just easier to understand, okay.

So unless the private property owner says we consent, it defaults to "no guns" under this statute, right?

MS. CAI: That's correct.

Okay. That's the way it's always been; THE COURT: that a person can go onto property unless there's a no gun So it just seems to me that this is a superfluous impediment that the State is imposing on private property And that tends to be -- and whenever there's a superfluous impediment, it seems to me that that infringes. MS. CAI: If I can --THE COURT: Help me understand what I'm missing. MS. CAI: If I can give the Court a very practical example. THE COURT: Yeah. MS. CAI: So if I'm a homeowner before Chapter 131 went into effect. THE COURT: Yeah. MS. CAI: And maybe I have little kids. Maybe I have a lot going on in the house, there's contractors coming in and out, I may not be thinking about whether or not the people coming in and out of my house, the plumber, the roofer, are carrying firearms. On the other hand, I may have a very, very strong preference and desire for people coming into my house not to have firearms because --THE COURT: Then post "no guns allowed." MS. CAI: So the problem with that is the onus, right, that would require the State to tell those property owners you have to speak in this way. And all Section 24 does is reverse that to say you don't have to speak. These other property owners have to speak.

THE COURT: Do you agree it's less onerous to post a no gun sign than to make a private property owner express a view? Because this is how I see it, and you can respond to it.

It seems to me, let's take a business owner, for example. As the law stood before the enactment of this law, if there was no sign posted, no guns, there was ambiguity as to whether or not that property was protected. Agreed with that?

MS. CAI: Yes. And that's a problem, right. Yeah.

THE COURT: Okay. But that may be -- that may be what the business owner desires, let's say. This ambiguity works as a deterrent, for example.

Now, under the new legislation it seems to me that the State is removing that ambiguity and that state is now forcing a private property owner to broadcast — against its will — that its property is unprotected. And so because by default if there's no signage, there's no expressed consent, the law says no guns. And it just seems to me that the ambiguity that perhaps worked to a business owner's advantage no longer does under this law. And we're getting a little bit far afield of the Second Amendment issue that may delve into First Amendment concerns and policy concerns that this Court doesn't delve into, but it does seem to pose an additional obstacle to the person entering the property.

The other question I have is, at what point does the gun owner know whether or not he has expressed consent? Does he walk down the winding driveway, get to the front door and until he's gotten to the front door, violate the law because he only learns when he gets to the front door that he didn't have consent?

At what point does the gun owner know that he shouldn't have a gun on my property?

MS. CAI: So to answer that question first, Section 24 makes clear that if you don't have expressed consent in some way, and it does not have to be a sign broadcasting "my property is unprotected," it only broadcasts that I'm not allowing other people into the property with firearms. It doesn't say the property is unprotected. But you don't have to post a sign. It could be direct communications with all the delivery people who come. It could be on your website. It could be calls. It does not have to be a sign, and so it's not compelling someone to speak.

THE COURT: No; I understand that. The statute doesn't say that. But is the law violated -- does the UPS man, woman, violate the law when he gets up to the front door and the owner says you should not have come on my property if you're armed?

MS. CAI: Yes. Yes.

But to Your Honor's question about, you know, who is the government regulating, in the opposite scenario, the government would be saying if you don't want guns on your property, you need to broadcast that to everyone via a sign or something else. THE COURT: Why can't the State just run an ad tomorrow saying if you don't want guns on your property, post a no gun sign? MS. CAI: It could. It certainly could. THE COURT: That seems much less onerous. MS. CAI: I think this gets to whether or not this is actually a Second Amendment question at all. So imagine that's what the State did. Broadcast to property owners: Know your rights. You can always exclude anyone from your property who you didn't want firearms [sic]. We encourage you to do it this way, all that. THE COURT: Yeah. MS. CAI: Nothing about the substantive right to bear arms has changed at all because the property owner always has the right to exclude, and the government is just letting the property owners know of ways to make that clear. This is no different.

THE COURT: Is not the State posing additional obstacles that are unnecessary?

MS. CAI: I don't think that the State is posing obstacles, and I don't think that they're unnecessary. And those are two different things.

The obstacle to any particular person's ability to carry on someone else's private property is that private property owner's wishes. So that's what's preventing any particular person from carrying on their property.

THE COURT: Right. But you've just told me that the armed UPS man or woman violates the law if he gets up to deliver the package and the person, the homeowner answers the door and says, "You're armed. You were not allowed on my property." You've just told me that.

So what is a person to do going forward with this legislation, never enter private property? Because the law doesn't even require signage. It just says verbal. So what is someone who has a license to conceal carry to do, never enter for risk of violating the law? And in the UPS example, leave the packages on the street? I mean, have you thought this through?

MS. CAI: I think that the law makes it very clear that you cannot enter someone else's property, their castle, without their permission with a firearm. And I think that happens for a number of reasons. And we can talk about the policy reasons, none of which is about the Second Amendment analysis at all.

THE COURT: Well, it is because you haven't really addressed the presumption; that there is a presumption of the right to carry.

MS. CAI: So -- but I think the problem is there is no presumption of the right to carry on private property if the property owner does not want you there. And so that has always been true. And I don't even, you know, to be honest, I don't know under prior trespass law what, you know, what exactly the line was with respect to whether or not you can carry on someone else's property without their expressed consent, especially if that property owner may be liable for damages from injuries with your firearm.

THE COURT: But to make it liable for trespassing under New Jersey, it has to be known to the potential trespasser ahead of time before he or she can be charged with trespassing. This law has no such provision. This law says you can walk down the winding driveway, get to the front door and the repairman is told you have just now violated the law, I'm calling the police.

MS. CAI: And that's exactly what the law provides, and that's only because there has always been, and there's no question, that private property owners have a right to exclude firearms from their property. And so what this law does is regulate what private property owners communicate and not the right to bear arms of the individual.

THE COURT: They've always had that right. But I think you're ignoring one salient fact, is that you're now making it criminal for a person who has a license to conceal carry to not know in advance what that right is.

MS. CAI: So that's right, Your Honor. There's two components to that. One is, if we're doing a Second Amendment analysis, we look to the historical analogues, if you assume that the Second Amendment does cover this conduct. And on that, Exhibit 13 and 14 are exact replicas of the same statute. And, in fact, Exhibit 13 is actually more prohibitive because the consent had to be in writing. And that's a 1771 New Jersey statute that specifically said you need to obtain expressed permission if you enter someone else's property with a firearm.

And so if we're going down the historical analysis route, and plaintiffs actually have no answer to this whatsoever, I think that indicates if we're doing a Second Amendment analysis on Section A24, plaintiffs cannot succeed on the merits.

But with respect to what exactly is the injury to the plaintiff and whether or not -- and I know you want to talk about irreparable harm a little bit later, but once we're on this point, I'm reluctant just to go off of it. I think it seems to me that what the plaintiffs are arguing is the irreparable harm to me is having to ask for permission. And if we assume that's a title -- or Article III injury, assuming that even is one, I think that's not --

THE COURT: I really don't think -- Ms. Cai, I don't think that's a fair attack on the record.

Again, having to ask isn't the injury. It's the risk that the plaintiffs are being put upon in the scenario that I have posited for you, which is that under this law, it is not known at what time in the scenario the plaintiff learns that he doesn't have the consent. But by then, it's a little too late. He has already violated the law. And that's the problem as I see it with this statute, because it puts a gun owner at risk of prosecution. And it's a risk that these plaintiffs are not willing to take, and so they leave their guns at home. And prior to the enactment of this statute, it didn't have that risk. There was no risk of criminal prosecution. The State has now put the risk of criminal prosecution on the gun owner's inability to read his neighbor's mind. And as I see it, that's the problem with the statute.

I asked you about the UPS carrier, the armed UPS carrier. You tell me he has violated the law if he gets up to the front door and the owner says you shouldn't have come on my property, you violated the law.

Is that how this law is going to operate; that someone who has gone to the extra measures of getting a concealed carry permit should phone his neighbor, phone his local hardware store, or phone his doctor's office to determine whether or not he can even come with a gun? Is that how this law is supposed to work?

1
               MS. CAI: So, yes, Your Honor. I think the risk is 2 to a person who's carrying a gun on someone else's property 3
    without having tried to -- without having asked for permission.
               Now, whether or not the UPS owner example, the very 4 5
    brief and incidental dropping off the package on the driveway would actually be prosecuted, that's another problem with risk 6
    of enforcement. The statute actually provides an exception for brief and incidental de minimis infractions. And so I don't know exactly what that would look like. And it probably 10 depends on whether or not, you know, the homeowner is 11 sufficiently upset and whether or not the prosecutor thinks 12
 8 9
    that that's de minimis or not.
               THE COURT: Where is that brief and incidental 13 14 exception?
15
               MS. CAI: It is in Section 7(b). I don't have exactly which sub-subprovision. I believe it is -- 16
17
               THE COURT: I don't see it.
18
               MS. CAI: I can provide that exact cite to Your 19
             I'm positive that there is a de minimis exception for Honor.
20
    all of the sensitive places.
21
               THE COURT: I didn't see it. I would like to -- 22
               MS. CAI: Oh, I'm sorry, it's 7(c). I'm sorry, Your 23
    Honor.
            It wasn't 7(b).
24
               THE COURT: And what does it say? Can you read it to 25
         Can you read that language to me?
    me?

1
               MS. CAI: Yes.
                               I'm looking for the specific part,
 2
    Your Honor, that my colleagues have just referred me to.
 3
               Oh, I'm sorry.
                               Okay. Oh, yes, Your Honor, so 7(a), 4
    the very first sentence: Except as otherwise provided in the 5
    section and in the case of a brief incidental entry onto property which shall be deemed a de minimis infraction, within 6 7
    the contemplation of N.J.S. 2C:2-11, it shall be a crime.
                           So it's still a crime. As I read this,
 8
               THE COURT:
 9
    it's still a crime under the de minimis.
10
               MS. CAI: No, Your Honor. That's not how I read it.
    Except as otherwise provided and except as in the case of a 11
    brief incidental entry onto property -- 12
13
               THE COURT: Which shall be deemed a de minimis infraction within the contemplation of 2C:2-11. That's a 14
15 criminal statute.
16
                        It's a criminal statute, but it doesn't
               MS. CAI:
17 criminalize your conduct. So it's not -- if you look at 18
    2C:2-11.
19
               THE COURT: What does that say?
20
               MS. CAI: I don't have that right in front of me, 21
    Your Honor. But it makes it -- 22
               THE COURT:
                           Do you know?
23
               MR. JENSEN: I don't know what that says, no.
24
                           Well, that says to me that even if it's a

was my next question, which is if I'm walking, if I have a concealed carry and I'm walking with my child and her ball, and her ball, she kicks it inadvertently onto my neighbor's property who I know doesn't want any firearms, does she leave the ball there? MS. CAI: Well, Your Honor, I think that's not even a question about Section 7(a) -- A724. If your neighbor has already made it known to you that they don't want your firearms there --I leave the ball there. THE COURT: Yeah. MS. CAI: Even before Chapter 131 went into place, that neighbor could call the police and try to institute a trespass action against you in any event, if they've made crystal clear to you do not bring firearms onto my property. So that's not really a question about Chapter 131. THE COURT: Well, I mean, we could go down the parade of horribles. I'm walking with my child and she gets very sick and she's now on his yard. I choose helping her or getting prosecuted, I quess. I mean, in all of New Jersey law, there's MS. CAI:

MS. CAI: I mean, in all of New Jersey law, there's always an exception for duress and other exigent circumstances. And so I think we don't have to go down those examples because I think what the plaintiffs are challenging is a facial challenge, the entire statute. We've discussed why it's perhaps not even irreparable to require someone to ask a question why it's not within the text of the Second Amendment to regulate property owner communication. And perhaps at the end of the road what's perhaps most important is that even under a Second Amendment historical analysis, the historical analogues are directly on point.

THE COURT: Okay.

 $\mbox{MS. CAI:}\mbox{ Does the Court want me to go further on }$ other provisions or --

THE COURT: Let me have, Mr. Jensen, can you respond to the private property and then I want to turn to transportation.

MR. JENSEN: Yes, Your Honor. And I'll try to be brief.

First and foremost, the historical analogues are not on point. These are both laws that, on their face, are directed for the purpose of preventing poaching. And as a side note, and perhaps I shouldn't say "side note" because it's quite material, when you get into that vehicle issue, I know we haven't gotten there yet, but many of the restrictions, modern day restrictions that are being cited in the context of restrictions on carrying firearms in motor vehicles are also restrictions that are directed towards this aim of keeping people from road hunting or keeping people from poaching.

So this 1771 New Jersey law, which is captioned an Act for the Preservation of Deer and Other Game and To Prevent Trespassing with Guns, virtually every operative provision of this law is directed at poaching.

Yes. If you take this language out of Section 1 and read it in isolation, it would appear to say, well, you just can't walk onto somebody's plantation or premises with a gun. If you look at everything else in the statute, it's clear that what's being talked about here is taking game.

And notably, if you do a little legal research on how this New Jersey law was construed, that's pretty much the result you walk away with.

Crew v. Thompson, 9 N.J.L. 249, 1827, they quote from a claim for damages asserted against someone who apparently trespassed on someone else's land and shot a deer or in some manner killed a deer. And that claim is being articulated under Section 1, the language that we're talking about. But it is extraordinarily clear that the whole gravamen of this is you trespassed on my land and shot my game so I'm coming after you for damages.

Much later, State versus One 1990 Honda Accord, 154

N.J. 373, a 1998 decision from the Supreme Court of New Jersey, this law is being characterized as a forfeiture statute for fish and game violations. That's nearly verbatim.

This is also true of this 1865 Louisiana act which, on its face, applies to entering onto plantations. And not insignificantly, if you look at the next following act in this exhibit, which is an act that's becoming effective on the same date, this is simply a blanket prohibition on entering a plantation without permission, gun or not.

To stretch this into the premise that there is some sort of grounded historical tradition of, by default, preventing guns from going onto private property requires a great deal of mental gymnastics.

Now, one thing that happens when we start talking about legal rules and historical precedence is we kind of lose track of what's actually going on here. So what the State would like to call reversing the presumption and I would call making the conduct illegal --

THE COURT: Can you talk to me about the presumption, because I think that there's a disagreement between the parties about the presumption that the Second Amendment holds. The State makes a distinction between public and private property; and you say?

MR. JENSEN: I say under Bruen, if we are talking about the act of keeping or bearing arms as it's presumptively protected, and the authorities that have been cited do not overcome that presumption --

THE COURT: Whether it's public or private property?

MR. JENSEN: Whether it's public or private property.

And to be fair, the majority of the East Coast is private property.

And as the Court has already alluded to, this is creating a situation where how is someone even realistically supposed to know this? You're walking down the street, there's a field that has grass. Is it private? Is it public? Are you supposed to, what, go down to the property clerk's office and do a records search to try to figure this out?

None of the laws, meaning the modern laws that are being cited in the State's brief to say oh, this is an established practice, actually stand for this proposition. The furthest they go is we have a couple of states that have said you can't enter into someone's residence, someone else's residence with a firearm without their permission. Is that constitutional or not? I don't know. It's really not the issue presented here.

In terms of an actual modern analogue, and I'm offering this for purposes of illustrating the burden we're talking about, obviously under Bruen, the analytic framework is looking back to 1791 or perhaps 1868. The only place I can see an actual analogue to this is Illinois. So Illinois was the last state to completely prohibit private citizens from carrying guns. And in the case I alluded to, Moore versus Madigan, that changed. But the statutes at issue in Illinois, unlawful use of weapons and aggravated unlawful use of weapons, while they generally prohibit people from carrying guns, one of the exceptions is if you're on private property with the permission of the owner or occupant of that property, okay.

So when we were arguing Moore, at no point in the litigation did anyone, the Attorney General's Office, the State Police, our side, anyone, say, oh, this is a sensitive place restriction. This is a law that allows carry subject to a requirement that you obtain the owner's permission. Everyone said, including all the reviewing courts, this is a ban.

Move this outside the context of guns. I can't think of any example where the default presumption is something is illegal on private property unless the owner has expressly consented. And I particularly can't think of any example that touches on constitutionally protected conduct, all right.

THE COURT: Well, that's what the State is arguing.

The State is arguing that there is no -- that your argument carries no weight because there is no such presumption that you have a right to carry a firearm onto private property.

MR. JENSEN: Well, I think saying that there is no presumption you have a right to carry a firearm in the first place is getting everything exactly wrong. There is a presumption that you have a right to carry a firearm. And the issue is whether or not we have established a sufficiently engrained historical tradition to overcome that.

Just -- this is going to sound like a ridiculous example, but that's kind of because it's ridiculous -- a private property owner, like my house, I can choose to exclude

1
     all sorts of people. I could choose to exclude people who are 2
           I could choose to exclude people who are members of races
 3
     I don't like.
 4
               Just to be clear, I'm certainly not doing this.
 5
    That's not my view. But I would be free to do this.
 6
               Now, if the legislature enacts a law that says the 7
    default rule is that gay people are not allowed in other people's private residences unless they have affirmatively
 8 9 consented in advance, would we even be standing here having 10 this argument? Would this not, on its face, be a law that 11
     serves the purposes of suppressing the conduct?
               Your Honor, unless you have anything further, I'll 12 13
     sit down just because I know we've been here for a long time.
14
               THE COURT:
                           Okay. Yeah.
                                         Thank you.
                                                     I want to move
15 to the issue of the transportation.
16
               Ms. Cai, let me hear you on the issue of 17 transportation.
18
               MS. CAI: Yes, Your Honor.
19
               THE COURT: On the -- it is 7(b).
20
                               I'll start by saying, as applied to
               MS. CAI:
                        Yes.
21 public transit, plaintiffs have a standing problem because 22
    they've never alleged any intent to ride public transit.
23 that front as well, there's also whether or not it falls within 24
    the text of the Second Amendment at all, because the government 25 when it operates a public transit vehicle is acting as a

proprietor of property as well as a market participant. So under cases like Class, the D.C. Circuit decision, and Bonidy, the Tenth Circuit decision, it just doesn't fall even within the text.

THE COURT: Okay.

MS. CAI: On private vehicles, I think what the plaintiffs are suggesting is that there needs to be some kind of historical analogue prohibiting firearms carry for something that didn't exist at the time of the founding or at reconstruction, which is automobiles. And I think the problem there is of course, Bruen already says if it's a new social problem that could not have been imagined by our founders or people in history, then you don't -- you look to even less of a direct analogue. You kind of look to the intent and what's going on there. And so I think here it makes a lot of sense to look at what states started doing as soon as automobiles came into practice, which is in the 1910s and '20s. And we've given examples of direct, you know, even in 1919 and 1920 states -- and this is Exhibit 16 and 17 -- requiring firearms to be unloaded in automobiles.

Now, plaintiffs quip, well, it was long guns and rifles and not handguns, et cetera. The problem with that kind of analysis is it doesn't get into at all why it was that the State was restricting the manner of carry in the way that they were. So I don't see any rationale that the plaintiffs have advanced for why the State could prohibit one versus the other. The fact that the State chose to prohibit one versus the other doesn't say it could not have also prohibited handguns loaded in the firearm, so I think that's the problem there.

If we want to look beyond automobiles because perhaps one thinks there are other ways of traveling that were similar to automobiles, we can look to the historical analogues that we cited prohibiting carrying firearms on day journeys basically, journeys within the State. And plaintiffs' response is, well, it defined journeys narrowly. True. But because Chapter 131 and Section 7(b)(1) only applies to New Jersey, it also applies in a similar way. It does not prohibit someone from carrying a loaded handgun once they've traveled out of the state, which is, you know, I think the bright historical analogue for the longer journey that was where firearms carry was allowed under the historical analogue. So I think that — if you wanted to line it up that way, I think that also supports our case.

And so I think this is the end-all, be-all of just, you know, how to think about why historical regulations were in place and whether they're relevantly similar. And I think on both of those analogues, the statutes were relevantly similar.

THE COURT: Do you agree that self-defense is at the core of the Second Amendment?

MS. CAI: Of course.

THE COURT: So how does someone who has an approved

1
     concealed carry defend himself if it's in the trunk, if the 2 firearm is in the trunk?
 3
               MS. CAI: So, first, Your Honor, the statute does not 4 require that the firearm be in the trunk. It just requires 5 that it be unloaded and fastened in some case. It could be on 6
     the -- in the glove box, it could be on the passenger side 7 seat. It could be, you know, in any number of locations where 8 thev --
 9
               THE COURT:
                           Okay. Fair enough.
10
               How does he protect himself with a disassembled or unloaded firearm?
11
12
               MS. CAI: Of course the person would have to then, if 13
     it faces a self-defense situation, take it out and load it.
               But that's the exact prohibitions that states have 14 put forth in history, and those were not challenged as 15
16
     unconstitutional, or at least the plaintiffs have not given us 17 any evidence.
18
               And that's because the government, you know, the 19 right to self-defense, as Bruen and McDonald and Heller have 20 noted, is not unlimited in every manner and to every person and 21 to every place. And so -- 22
               THE COURT: Do you agree with the plaintiffs that 23
     this provision treats every permit holder the same?
24
               MS. CAI:
                        I -- yes.
25
               THE COURT:
                           Okay.

MS. CAI: I wasn't sure if there was a -- every permit holder has the same, yes, has the same -- has to follow the same rules.

But I think if we look to the rationales that the courts interpreting the historical statutes have justified them, plaintiffs have no responses. So we explain on page 34 of the brief that the journeys regulation was to prevent people from, quote, going about the streets armed in a manner which, if in a sudden fit of passion, might endanger the lives of This is the road rage analogue from the 1800s, I others. suppose. And that's precisely one of the reasons why Section (b)(1) was enacted. The legislature wanted people to be able to transport their firearms between places where they're allowed to carry them, right. So it didn't prohibit having firearms in your vehicle. It just prohibited people from having such easy access to the firearm that if they were in a sudden fit of passion or if there was a car accident or something like that, that it would create danger to others. And so that's the prohibition that exists now and has always animated the restrictions historically.

THE COURT: And so the State envisions it that if someone with a concealed carry permit wakes up and plans his day, that he puts the -- let's just use the trunk -- he puts the firearm in the trunk. He goes to his cousin who doesn't want firearms. He leaves it in the trunk. He then goes to the local market that permits firearms. He goes and he gets it out of the trunk, puts it together in public view, citizens see. Citizens are going to get alarmed. Perhaps he's brandishing the weapon, one might argue. And then he goes to the local market, then he comes back out, he then brandishes the weapon, one could argue, puts it into the trunk and goes to another establishment where he's not quite sure, so he puts it in the trunk and then goes up, gets the expressed consent, yes, that's fine, goes back to his trunk, puts the firearm, assembles the firearm and then goes about and reenters the property. That's how the State envisions the day in the life of a gun owner? That could be, Your Honor. I will note MS. CAI: that, once again, it doesn't have to be in the trunk. he wanted to keep it in the trunk while he wasn't there, I think that's a very good idea, and I think perhaps that's actually required by 7(b)(2) which plaintiffs don't challenge. But he could very well take the bag or the case or whatever it is stored in, bring it into the car if he's not comfortable loading it outside in view of others. If he's concerned about that risk which I'm not quite sure, you know, if that risk, that concern is super legitimate, but he can just -- he could load it in the car and put it in his holster. THE COURT: Does that scenario I just laid out for you sound like self-defense?

MS. CAI:

I presume that the plaintiff is doing that because he wants to have the firearm loaded when he walks into the store that allows him to have it. And so, yes, he's arming himself.

THE COURT: And while he's traveling. But he's told he cannot, right?

MS. CAI: Well, while he's traveling, when he's driving the car, he has the firearm, he can have the firearm within reach, and it's just about whether or not he can have it loaded and unsecured somewhere in the car while he's doing that. And so I think there's perhaps some infringement on the immediate ability to have that firearm loaded and on you. That restriction — and I do admit that is a restriction — has been historically upheld.

THE COURT: And I appreciate your candor.

MS. CAI: Yeah.

THE COURT: Yes.

MS. CAI: Yeah. And my point is just that that particular restriction has historical analogues and the analogues have been upheld.

I will also note, and this relates back to something that Mr. Jensen said about the New Jersey statute and the Louisiana statute on going into someone else's property without their consent, but it also applies to their argument on their reply brief page 11 on the main statute that prohibits loaded firearms in vehicles.

Plaintiffs say, you know, that restriction is confined to hunting. This is where the rush really does not work, because that law in our — I believe it's Exhibit 27 — or sorry, 17, the law actually amended the title from "prohibiting hunting from automobiles," to the more general "possessing of loaded shotgun or rifle in motor vehicles in highways, field, or forests," and so it's not just about hunting.

And the same with the New Jersey law and the Louisiana law, there are separate provisions on poaching and trespassing on other game lands. But the specific provisions were just about private property. And, in fact, what Mr. Jensen just did was read the word "premises" or "plantation" out of the title of the Louisiana statute.

And so if you look at Exhibit 12 -- I'm sorry, Exhibit 14, you'll see that it's prohibiting carrying of firearms on premises or plantation of any citizen without the consent of the owner. And so it does not only apply to plantations. It's any premises held by a private owner. So I think being careful about what the statutes actually say is really important.

And I understand the rush to get something before the Court is maybe what led to these mistakes, but I think that's also why the historical record has to be fully developed so that we can actually have a full record to go on.

And, again, because this is a theme
          THE COURT:
throughout the State's papers, what is it that the State is missing other than a more thorough analysis, if you will?
Because if the historical analogues existed at the time of the legislation's passage, why aren't they before me now?
          MS. CAI: Sure, Your Honor.
          I think that the legislature saw sufficient numbers of analogues to do what it wanted to do, which is pass the law in the way that it did.
          THE COURT: And so where are they?
          MS. CAI: So we have submitted a number of them to this Court.
          THE COURT:
                      Yes.
          MS. CAI:
                   There may be others out there.
          THE COURT: Oh, okay.
          MS. CAI: I don't know, right. And so if there are others out there that support -- that further support the longstanding history or if there's additional case law out there that supports the idea that these laws were not challenged or weren't deemed constitutional, we would want to provide them to this Court.
          THE COURT: Okay. I wanted to make sure I understood what you were saying.
          You are not telling me that there are, in fact,

1 there. 2 MS. CAI: That's correct, Your Honor. 3 THE COURT: Okay. MS. CAI: And to the extent that plaintiffs are 4 5 saying well, this law actually meant X or Y, that's different 6 from what the State is positing. I think we would then have a 7 development of why it is that they're wrong or we're wrong and all that. 8 9 And Mr. Jensen just cited a number of cases that he 10 did not put in his brief and so we would want to respond to 11 that as well with further briefing. THE COURT: All right. While you're standing, talk 12 13 to me about irreparable injury. MS. CAI: Sure, Your Honor. 14 15 A very general point and then a more specific point 16 on irreparable injury. 17 THE COURT: Yes. 18 MS. CAI: So the general point is that the black 19 letter law is that irreparable harm is a separate and 20 independent gateway requirement for emergency relief that's 21 separate from the merits. And you can look to any number of 22 Third Circuit cases, but I think the Supreme Court's decision 23 in Benisek versus Lamone, which we cite in our brief, makes 24 this crystal clear. 25 It says a preliminary injunction does not follow as a matter of course from a plaintiff's showing of a likelihood of success on the merits. And as the movant also must show, quote, that he is likely to suffer irreparable harm in the absence of preliminary relief and, of course, if the rest of the factors tip in his favor.

And so Third Circuit cases like Anderson and Hohe and other courts of appeals cases, we cite the Eleventh Circuit en banc case in Siegel, those all confirm that even with constitutional cases where plaintiffs have been held to have shown a likelihood of success on their constitutional claims, some of them are First Amendment claims, they still have to do more than that and show irreparable harm.

And I think one of the ways in which this is best illustrated, and I think I already talked about this a little bit, is with respect to the private property problem. So plaintiffs say, well, we need to then get permission to go on to other people's property with our firearms. And that may be Article III injury. But I don't see how that's irreparable for the period of time that they're asking for the injunction. Simply asking for permission to clarify whether or not the private property owner does or doesn't want firearms on their property is not irreparable harm. And so I think that's the more specific example that I can provide to this Court.

THE COURT: But that's not the only injury that the plaintiffs are complaining about, in fairness. They are complaining about the right to self-defense, to defend themselves, and that these provisions, in essence, because they are forced to keep their firearms at home, deprive them of their constitutional right to self-defense.

The cases are clear that a First Amendment violation is by definition irreparable injury. Is there a reason why the First Amendment should be prioritized over the Second Amendment?

MS. CAI: I think the law of the Third Circuit is not even that all First Amendment injuries are necessarily irreparable. The Hohe case and the Conchatta case make that clear. Instead --

THE COURT: That's true. I'm sorry, Ms. Cai. That's true. But I think you have to look at it in context.

So in a First Amendment case, for example, if there were a law or a decree that you are precluded from on May 1st protesting on the courthouse steps, that might not be an immediate irreparable injury, but you don't have such exception here. The law has taken effect immediately.

MS. CAI: Your Honor, I think what the case law says, and if you look at the case that it all comes back to, the Elrod case, is there's irreparable harm in that case because the First Amendment political speech context in particular is central to irreparable timeliness component, because people want to make a political speech at a particular moment in time, otherwise the speech has a different meaning where it has less value or it has less impact.

THE COURT: Of course. And these plaintiffs want to get in the car and defend themselves tomorrow, this afternoon, 30 minutes from now. What's the difference?

MS. CAI: I think the difference is that plaintiffs haven't even attempted to say what it is that is irreparable about their desire to carry firearms. If that were true, Your Honor, if the plaintiffs were right, all they had to do was succeed on the merits of their Second Amendment claim, then we would be reading the irreparable harm element out of preliminary injunction and TROs entirely.

THE COURT: Well, that's why I asked the question though, Ms. Cai, which is, the case law seems to me to be very clear that a First Amendment violation is by definition irreparable. It seems to me the State is insisting that a First Amendment right is more important than a Second Amendment right. That's what it seems to me the State is saying.

MS. CAI: In a number of doctrines, the Supreme Court has basically made special exceptions for the First Amendment, not just relative to the Second Amendment, but across all other constitutional rights. And I don't -- you know, I don't purport to have the full sort of doctrinal explanation of why that has to be true.

But what I do know is that the black letter law is that irreparable harm has to be a separate, standalone requirement from likelihood of success on the merits.

It is possible that plaintiffs could show irreparable harm. They just haven't tried to do so. All they do is rely on we're going to succeed on the merits, and that's just not enough according to case law.

THE COURT: All they do is what?

MS. CAI: Is to say we will succeed on the merits, and that's just not enough.

Thank you, Your Honor.

THE COURT: You want to respond.

MR. JENSEN: Sure, Your Honor.

You know, preliminarily, another rhetorical question:

Is the denial of the right to vote an irreparable injury if a plaintiff doesn't come in with proof that their vote would have altered the outcome of the election? Because that's pretty much what I'm hearing here for why the interest in armed self-defense isn't an irreparable injury.

To be frank, I don't -- knock on wood -- I don't see irreparable injury as a particularly close issue here. We cited a raft of decisions that have found that the denial of Second Amendment rights is an irreparable injury.

What I would really say is just take one step back and look at what we're actually doing here. You know, obviously this requirement of irreparable injury stems back to the division of courts between courts of law and courts of equity and the general presumption that if a plaintiff has a claim, that claim should be answered in money damages.

It's also extremely well established that the denial of constitutional rights, as a general premise, is an irreparable injury. Yes, there are some specific applications where it's not going to be an irreparable injury. For example, if you have a Takings Clause claim, the whole premise of this is you're supposed to be paid for your property. The injury and the remedy for it is a claim for money damages, even though you have a constitutional entitlement.

If it's a situation like Hohe where, look, the law hasn't even come into effect yet, there's still plenty of time for the court to act, yeah, if the law comes into effect, it may impose an irreparable injury. But as we stand here right now, it's not clear someone's facing imminent irreparable injury.

If someone needs to exercise their right of armed self-defense and they don't have a functional arm on their person, that is the irreparable injury; or, otherwise stated, having to go out, go forth in the world without having that level of comfort or assurance is what the irreparable injury is, much in the same way that the inability to freely express one's thoughts would be an irreparable injury regardless of whether or not someone had anything that was actually particularly insightful or relevant to say.

With regard to these vehicle cases, I understand, and I think the Court does, too, that we're looking for historical analogues and relevant similarity, but just one big picture point. I have lived all over this country. I have owned guns and hunted everywhere I lived. I do not know of any state that does not prohibit private citizens from having loaded rifles and shotguns in vehicles. However, the only state that is prohibiting at least licensed individuals from having operative, functional handguns on their persons in their vehicles is New Jersey. New York also passed a whole host of these laws in response to Bruen, although even in New York they didn't go that far. So not only are we lacking historical analogues here, frankly, we're lacking modern analogues.

This 1919 main law by its terms applies only to rifles and shotguns. The 1929 Iowa law, it says all firearms, but then it exempts handguns. That's a fairly common legislative approach that I've seen in current times in the statute books, which is either the statute only applies to rifles and shotguns or it applies to all firearms, but it exempts people who are licensed to carry with regard to a handgun.

And why can the State allow people to carry handguns but not rifles or shotguns at least in vehicles? I think it's the same reason why can the state of New Jersey say you must carry your handgun in a concealed manner. Or alternatively, they could potentially also say you must carry your handgun in an open manner. The real question is, is the right of armed self-defense being protected here? And of course, in the big picture, it's not real clear that in a personal defense situation a rifle or shotgun in a vehicle is going to be of a lot of use.

The way this is going to come up is you're going to be stopped at a stop sign and two guys are going to come running up and rip you out of the car before you realize what happened. And that gun that's in the box, on the seat beside you, or in the trunk, you're never going to have a chance to grab it. And even if you were driving around Camden with a 12-gauge in the front seat, which might draw a little attention to yourself, it's also pretty unlikely you're going to be able to get that weapon out of the car. In terms of the actual historical —

THE COURT: But to the argument that the plaintiff makes is that it renders meaningless the right to self-defense.

MR. JENSEN: It effectively does, I mean, because look, all right, let's just state the obvious, the apparent purpose of this is the State's concern about road rage incidents. And I am sure we are all united in our desire to not be shot while driving down the New Jersey Turnpike, all right. Now, the problem is if someone decides I'm going to go shoot some other motorist, they're not reacting to a defensive situation. They've got time to get the gun out of the box and load it and go murder this other person. It's the person who is reacting to a defensive situation that's going to be bearing the brunt of this burden.

When we look at these historical laws, we've talked about Northampton. The 1869 Tennessee statute says you can't have guns at racecourses. I think we're talking about horseraces. Like not really much of an analogy.

1870 Texas law we've talked about a few times may not be a totally pertinent example. But other social gathering, that's a pretty far stretch to a vehicle.

1876 Iowa act, it's illegal to shoot at trains. I don't really see what this has to do with being able to carry a firearm in a vehicle.

We've got these laws that are either prohibitions on concealed carry or restrictions on carry but which have exceptions for people on journeys. Well, this seems to reflect the idea that going back a long way, even if you're going to restrict people's ability to have arms, they're going to have a particular need for it while they're on a journey. Journeys typically involve vehicles. It seems to really be saying exactly the opposite of the way it's being portrayed right now.

Well, there you have it. Do you have any more questions for me, or shall I keep talking?

THE COURT: Can you distinguish the cases of irreparable injury that the defendants have cited to?

MR. JENSEN: Well, just what I said. First and foremost, whether or not irreparable injury is imminent. If the law isn't coming into force for some period of time, it may not be imminent. If the underlying injury is one that would be remedied by money damages in the first place, that's not by definition irreparable injury.

Also, a good example would be Los Angeles versus Lyons, right, that's where someone was basically choked half to death by a member of the LAPD and they were trying to get an injunction saying, hey, LAPD, stop using these strangleholds.

It's an unreasonable use of force. It violates my Fourth Amendment rights.

Well, presumably, the actual act of being subjected to a stranglehold is an irreparable injury. The issue there is because the whole premise of this is you're raising the issue of misconduct, something that shouldn't be happening in the first place. You've got an issue of immanence, right?

Basically it's the same thing as we have with Parratt-Hudson doctrine with regard to the idea that -- well, let me just leave it at that. I'm going to get too far afield if I go down that one.

But the idea that whether or not the injury that's being threatened is actually one that is likely to occur, because Parratt-Hudson has to do with unauthorized deprivations, like Parratt was the prison -- or maybe it was The prison guard steals the inmate's things, and the government is like but the prison quards aren't supposed to steal these things. Maybe, maybe not the active theft is an irreparable injury. But because the whole premise of this is we're talking about unauthorized actions, things that shouldn't be happening, it's not imminent. In the context of, the Constitution secures a right to engage in personal conduct, right, whether that's the right to go to a school that isn't segregated, whether that's the right to speak freely, whether that's the right to vote in an There is no basis for saying that the ability to election. engage in the core conduct of the Second Amendment, the keeping and bearing of arms, is not irreparable injury. I just have a quick question for you, Ms. Cai, and then one observation that I want to make and then I'll let you folks -- we'll adjourn. And this goes to the public interest factor.

Does the State have any evidence that concealed carry holders are responsible for an increase in gun crimes?

MS. CAI: Not specifically, Your Honor, no.

THE COURT: Okay. The next is an observation that says -- that deals with the -- I had a look at 2C. You might recall that we were looking at the de minimis infractions earlier and you had promised to get that to me. You don't need

    I have it here. 2C:2-11, it is a de minimis infraction under the code. And the legislation treats it -- the new legislation treats it as such. It is considered a prosecution.
It gives the authority of the assignment judge to dismiss the prosecution if having regard to the nature of the conduct charged to constitute an offense and the nature of the attendant circumstances the Court finds that the defendant's conduct... and then there are three elements that the Court must find under 2C:2-3. And so that was the question that I had. It nonetheless is considered an infraction under the code, but it gives the judge the authority not to press the charges.
          So the point is, there's no need for you to follow up
